AFTERNOON TEA

Over 8,000 people are diagnosed with triple negative breast cancer every year in the UK. Dr Gillian Seaton and Professor Richard Clarkson are working at Cardiff University to find new ways to make triple negative breast cancer more sensitive to chemotherapy.

"Every breakthrough is only possible because of the generosity of people who fundraise and support us.

Your donations allow us to explore these bold new ideas, bringing us closer to better treatments and a future where no one has to experience breast cancer.

Triple negative breast cancer can be one of the hardest types to treat. Chemotherapy is often the best option, but some tumours develop resistance, making treatment much less effective.

We've identified a protein that seems to help cancer cells survive chemotherapy, and now we're working to understand how blocking this protein could make treatment work better."
